It goes like this...

I was in the middle of defending a murder and robbery trial and my wife fell at work and broke her foot and the only person who could help her get to the doctor was her sister who has early dementia.

...seriously. And, more, but I won't share now.

Told y'all last week we are in a frontal attack. Now, a footal attack. :)

Seriously, pray for my wife. She will find out a week from today whether she will need a pin in her 5th metatarsal on her right foot. Which means, for now, no driving. Which means I am her chauffeur. And my daughter's for school, cheer practice, etc. while I finish this trial in court.

Hello brother,

Just remembered your post.

How is your wife's foot? I hope she didn't need a pin in it.

May the mercy of the Lord be plentiful upon you and yours in this season, amen.

So far, so good. Dr visit next week will be definitive re pin, but I doubt she will need it. She has an aircast boot and one of those knee scooters. We are believing the Lord for a rapid healing in spite of warnings that this is a slower healing fracture. Our home group laid hands on her Saturday night and her foot went from black and blue to pink before our eyes and she has managed much better ever since.
